There is an Annual Demand for 75,000,000 Tons of Low-Grade Variety-Direct Result of Lessons Taught by War.

New York .- America's fast thinning | comment deposits are yielding more and more grudgingly the 75,000,000 tons of iron ore annually consumed in this country, according to authorities at Columbia university, where the upbuilding ison Hi site is used for the entire of ore-dressing laboratories is being iness. What little I ate did me fostered by big outside enterprises. even a small margin of gain enormous out of order. I didn't know tonnages of low grade ores, requiring highly specialized scientific knowledge company for the promotion of research about its being a great medicine. in the problems of ore concentration, is further evidence of the generous attitude on the part of many company officials toward the engineering schools," Professor Taggart said.

Another Lesson From the War. "It is a direct result of the lesson investigators in the universities.

"The importance of thorough and specialized training in ore-dressing has been recognized coincidentally with the rapidly increasing demand for scientifie and technical knowledge Imposed on concentrating mill operators by the constant diminution in grade of metallic ores available for exploitation. In the old days of high-grade ore deposits no special knowledge was necessary to make a profit out of the treatment of the ores mined.

"According to W. G. Swart, mining and metallurgical engineer of Duluth, in an article written for Engineering Foundation, which is fostering industrial research on a nationwide scale, each year there are consumed in the United States about 75,000,000 tons of iron ore. Known deposits meeting this requirement are being rapidly depleted. The economic utilization of low-grade ores is the solution of this problem." "To treat the present-day, low-grade ores at a profit requires the handling of enormous tonnages on a very small margin of possible gain." Professor nitiation and direction of such proj-Since no two problems of ore treatment are alike, training in the subject properly takes the line of a thorough grounding in fundamental principles, with each lesson pointed, where possible, by an experiment with a typical piece of mill apparatus. Such training for the general student in mining and metallurgy fits him for attack on the usual concentrating problems that will arise in his engineering experi-

Intensive Training.

"The man who plans to be a specialist in ore treatment needs more intensive training. This may be obtained either in the field or in school, but such a man will save time if he does part of his preparation in a school where the experience of an instructor is available for direction of his efforts and help in his difficulties.
For such a student intensive research into some difficult and, preferably, slightly explored field is the best of

"His calls in later work will mostly come only because others have failed in the solution of the particular problem, which usually means that it is new and difficult. Hence, his training must teach methods of attack and aid the development of the student's imagination, initiative and analytical ability. Research as outlined will do this, or it will make evident the lack of such qualities, without which successful specialization is impossible, and thus save much labor and dis-

"Co-operation between the universities and the industries of the country has been the subject of much thought within the last few years and many plans have been put forward to make such co-operation effective and profitable to both parties."
